Coaching Plan

Three Perspectives on Your Child

Child and God

- When your child faces a hard situation, do they naturally turn to God — or do they turn to you, a friend, or themselves first?
- How does your child talk about God? Is He someone they love and trust, or more of a rule-giver they feel they need to please?
- What does your child want that only God can truly satisfy? Do they know that yet?
- Is your child developing a faith of their own, or are they just borrowing yours?
- What false gods (comfort, approval, control, achievement) seem to compete for your child's heart?

Child and Self

- Does your child have a realistic, grace-based view of their strengths and weaknesses — or do they swing toward pride or shame?
- How does your child respond to failure? Does it crush them, or can they receive correction and move on?
- Is your child learning to work independently, or do they rely heavily on external motivation and supervision?
- Does your child seem comfortable in their own skin, or do they seem anxious about how others perceive them?

Child and Others

- What does your child do with other people — do they serve them, compete with them, use them, or avoid them?
- How does your child handle not getting their way with a friend or sibling?
- Does your child's behavior change significantly when you're not watching? What does that tell you?
- What patterns in your child's relationships keep repeating — and what heart issue might be driving them?
- Is your child learning to find their security in Christ, or are they dependent on the approval of peers?

Assignment

As a couple, evaluate each of your children through the lens of their relationship with God, Self and Others.
